

FOR A WORKERS' DAY OF INTERNATIONALIST COHESION AMONG COMMUNISTS

Message from the “Unity and Struggle Group” (Agrupación Unidad y Lucha) and “Communist Workers’ Collective” (Colectivo Obrero Comunista)
to the communist comrades around the world

To the eyes of every serious communist it is not a surprise that the communist movement lies fragmented, scattered without a clear path, and above all, lacking of any influence amidst the proletarian movement.

Ever since the closure of the revolutionary period of the XX century, the sparse communist movement has been unable to advance towards becoming a true alternative to the working class movement, it has not developed the elements needed to take part in crucial situations that may lead our class to a new cycle of proletarian revolution, and in many occasions, it has favored the infiltration of bourgeois stances that deviate our class even more from the revolutionary path.

Thus, the proletariat finds itself at the will of the bourgeoisie and their stances, tied to reformist policies that are incapable, and have no intention, of guiding it to its own emancipation.

Nevertheless, facing the recurrent crisis of capitalism and the increasing decay of its living conditions, the proletariat has given signals of the fury within the class and of the capacity to say “Enough is enough!”, in order to recover its human dignity. Even with such demonstrations of the force that emanates from the workers, the communist organizations have been lacking clarity and strength to shed light on the revolutionary road that leads to the emancipation of mankind from capitalism.

It is a fact that nowadays communists have inherited old and complex “traditions”, through which communism has been deformed to a series of dogmas that in no sense incarnate the essence of communism. As a consequence, there are several generations of so-called communists that have been reluctant to question such dogmas and to critically tackle their own praxis. In this manner, the systematic repetition of obsolete and anachronistic formulas takes place, preserving such “traditions” in a religious fashion.

Nonetheless, during these times there have always been a handful of communist groups that are true to the principles of communism, and have been trying to lay the foundations of an authentic communist tradition. Struggling against the onslaughts of the counter-revolutionary forces arising from the left of the capital, disguised as “communism” that have been trying to silence their voices. Moreover, the tactical differences and sometimes the differences between the principles that govern each communist group, have derived in divergent stances with a tendency to rupture between such groups.

Through this difficult times, amongst the severe current crisis of capitalism in its imperialist phase that systematically drags the proletarian masses to a vortex of obliteration, hunger and death; facing a concrete possibility of a worldwide war to “solve” the inter-imperialist contradictions, several communists organized in compact collectivities take the initiative to speak out, to take a step forward, and to take in our hands the tasks that the current juncture demands. We consider that it is time to shake off the crisis in which our movement is stuck and to take actions to help the proletariat to recover its class independence, its momentum and its revolutionary sense.

From this perspective, and from mexican soil -where we are circumstantially based-, we announce with great excitement that our collectivities, the Agrupación Unidad y Lucha and the Colectivo Obrero Comunista, have been developing in the past months a process of coordination and articulation with solid foundations in the clarification and the critical discussion of our communist principles and our revolutionary projects. Today we make manifest our firm conviction to gradually advance in toward a programatic unity that will arise from the deepest, honest and critical discussion. To face the inexhaustible fragmentation of the communist groups, we firmly and indisputably pronounce ourselves for the cohesion and unity among revolutionaries, always with foundations in solid marxists principles.

Without a doubt we believe that the proletariat cannot be aligned with inter-classists efforts under the idea of the support or backup that the petite or the national bourgeoisie may "offer" in such junctures, mostly incarnated as anti-imperialist or anti-fascist fronts. For this reason, we firmly struggle for the absolute independence of the proletarian class. In the same sense, we consider that the decisive struggle between capital and labour cannot be contained within national borders. In the same way that capital is not held in isolated countries and doesn't stop its expansion by any national scruple, the proletariat cannot be deviated from its revolutionary objective by nationalist ideology. To this end the international class solidarity is crucial, hence, the proletarian internationalism is a fundamental principle. We pronounce ourselves in favor of the struggle for the dictatorship of the proletariat against the dictatorship of capitalism: we must rise against the totality of the bourgeoisie social order, against its political form, parliamentarism, and reject every reformist and opportunist struggle methods! This process also implies the need to deeply discuss the strategies needed to directly intervene in the proletarian movement in order to consistently unify our collectivities.

For several months we have worked diligently toward a process of unity, because we do not believe integration comes from empty or pre-arranged calls-to-action, which only find their logical result in the seeking of credibility through the quantitative gathering of masses, and in the re-routing of the communist work into the path of socialdemocratic mass movement -i.e. "the more militants we gather, the more votes we get"-, opportunism and bourgeois politicking. Our collectives are clear that unity is a dialectical process that can only render results if all the elements that differentiate one collective from another are made transparent and if these elements are discussed with rigor and clarity so that we can arrive at syntheses that allow us, in practice, to advance toward a joint revolutionary position or, alternatively, to define the real limits of our convergence and our tasks.

We are aware, of course, that this unity process, like any revolutionary task, will have its own advances and setbacks, as has happened so far; we know that we have great challenges ahead and that the ideological struggle requires us to be rigorous in our education and also to sharpen our critical perspectives in order to take this process to the only place we believe we must reach: to bring the proletariat back to the communist perspective, catalyzing its forces so that it can arrive at the struggle for the proletarian revolution with all of its strength and creativity, and thus can build its proletarian power, its emancipation, and that of all humanity.

Nevertheless, this task cannot -and must not- be completed alone or isolated, it's resolution requires the participation of all communists in the planet: the proletarian revolution must be a worldwide revolution, this is a necessary condition for the real emancipation of the revolutionary proletariat. We reaffirm our absolute internationalist perspective, therefore we must also make our greatest efforts to initiate a broad process of discussion and clarification with other comrades and internationalist collectives. A clarification based on principles and on a direct discussion of our differences, and aimed at the consolidation of an international and internationalist organization whose objective is to put all of its strength and effort into the intervention within the proletarian movement, and to guide it towards a new wave of world proletarian revolution.

We are aware that the tasks we have set for ourselves are profound and complex, but we also believe that we cannot remain passive and that our class deserves and demands that we rise to the occasion. Doubts may assail us, but clarity of principles and the need for broad, deep and fraternal discussion for the sake of ideological clarification and revolutionary progress must always keep us on the right path.

Thus, from this place and time, this International Workers' Day, we call upon comrades from all over the world to take in their hands the revolutionary role that the great communists of yesteryear have inherited to us, to build the elements needed to achieve clarification between communists, and by these means, to clarify for the working class its historical tasks, aided by the construction of this internationalist space for the ideological struggle and for the realization of the objectives that is demanded to us.

We hope to receive from all our comrades around the world the criticisms, observations and warnings they deem necessary, and that, in the near future, this will allow us to assemble an international revolutionary force to achieve the objectives we have set for ourselves as communists.

For the political independence of the proletariat!

We workers have no country!

Long live proletarian internationalism!
